Writing that's spanned three decades owes a powerful debt to dozens—maybe hundreds—of people. Readers of countless drafts, small portions and large. Literary agents who've inspired us mightily (and sometimes, admittedly, left us dispirited). Friends whose houses and cottages I've commandeered to try to write in for a few days or a week. Aging relatives who tried desperately to recall the subject in the years and days before Henrietta headed west. Apache sources who helped us retrieve the story of her time on the reservation—including some who worried that we were just two more Easterners from a very different world, ready to exploit Apache history once again. To almost every person who ever asked me to describe the story I was working on, who renewed my excitement and enthusiasm every time: you probably are not even aware of the effect you had.

And then there are the people I specifically want to name, who had out-sized influence and provided immeasurable impetus:

Evelyn Kamanitz, first and foremost! The originator and heart of this search, my partner in this journey from beginning to end. That her name is not listed as a co-author of this book is her decision, but her influence is boundless. When “we” is referred to in this book, it is Evelyn and I—sister and brother—who are meant. The journeys we took—to museums, archives, and particularly to the White Mountain reservation—were quite literal, as well as figurative.

Gordon Pradl came to this project late in its writing, but had a hugely disproportionate effect on its being completed. (In fact, I'm sure I'd be making excuses right now for why I couldn't finish it this year...) I relied heavily on his keen editorial eye and organizational skills in the book's latter stages.

Paul Levy and I spent a summer week together in 2012, with the original intent of each finishing our own book, and maybe helping each other. Paul finished his before we even got together, and not only inspired me with his writing brilliance and self-publishing success, but helped me rethink more than one major portion of the book.

Elizabeth Segal was an admirer of the Henrietta story long before I put her professional proofreading skills to important use, and her editing can be felt in the tighter and (mildly) shortened pages you're about to read.

Anne Atkinson, my partner in all things, put aside her legal responsibilities whenever I needed a sharp (and logical) eye on the writing, undoubtedly understanding there would never be total equanimity in our lives until this project was done.

Irv Nathan was my guide and advocate through the difficult two years it took to pry the Henrietta file loose from the FBI. We managed to make a bit of judicial history in the process, and Irv's eminent legal career survived!

Willie Schmerler, our younger brother, made a number of extremely helpful interventions along the way, particularly when it came to the court proceedings—and then brought indispensable perspective and care to the manuscript in its later stages.

There were many other important influences, and even beginning to name them will undoubtedly lead to slighting additional people who helped shape this book: Jennifer Robinson, Larry Kamanitz, David Potter, Hilde Weisert, Hope O'Keeffe, Rima Shore, Dik Mickle, Niki Harris, are just the first names in what would be a very long list.

Of course, this book would never have happened without Sam Schmerler, Henrietta's brother and our father, who suffered through the events in real time and then through much of the writing, but did not live long enough to see this book completed. It is dedicated to him.
